You had left the silence before you, born of a violent collision long ago.

In seconds, they were circling you at the night party, admiring you like a clock tower, wasting your time.

Suddenly I saw your bright face fill up when our hands aligned, and high noon struck behind midnight.

Eccentric like a comet, I drew closer and closer and we started dancing in the chaotic embrace of a three-body problem:

No matter how close we are now, there is no telling how far we'll be tomorrow;

no matter how far apart we are now, we might collide tomorrow, for violent attractions meet violent delights sometimes.
